- Examples of taxable awards and prizes
 - Employee Recognition awards – To meet the IRS tests for exemption, such awards should be occasional and presented infrequently. Awards presented to an employee on a regular or routine basis do not meet the IRS test and can be viewed as compensation. An employee should not receive a recognition award more than 3 times per calendar year and each award should not exceed the per-person limit ($75 for recognition awards other than a one-month parking permit or transit pass). If any of the awards exceed the per-person limit, the full value of the award is taxable. For example:
 - If an employee receives three spot awards during the calendar year and each one is equal to or under $75, none of the awards are taxable.
 - If an employee receives three spot awards during the calendar year in the amounts of $75, $100, $50, the $100 award is fully taxable.
 - If the employee receives four spot awards during the year, the total of all cash awards received for the year is taxable.
 - Raffle and door prizes and incentive gift cards: The $75 per-person limit is also applicable to these prizes. For example, if an employee wins a camera worth $200 as a door prize at a department party, the entire $200 is taxable.
 - Unallowable awards - The following are non- allowable under policy:
 - Yearly gifts to employees at the holidays or end of fiscal year.
 - Gift cards or gifts to improve morale
